ETO Homes Spec. Manual

The new Energy Trust of Oregon Existing Homes Specification Manual goes into effect on July 1, 2014. Copies will be mailed to all active Energy Trust of Oregon Existing Homes trade allies. To download an electronic copy of the new manual, visit http://energytrust.org/library/forms/HES_WX_Manual_2014.pdf

Updates in the new manual include:

- Windows specifications changes, including requirements for 12.5 percent elasticity in caulk used for window installation and caulking over concave backer rod to assist drainage
- Clarifications to weatherproofing exterior sheathing requirements, including drip caps to be used for flanged window flashing
- New heating system specifications, with gas furnace, gas boiler, gas fireplace and central heat pump specifications based on mechanical code, and ductless heat pump specifications based on NW Ductless Heat Pump Project guidelines
- New water heater specifications, with gas and electric tank water heater specifications based on mechanical code, and heat pump water heater specifications based on Smart Water Heat guidelines

- Best practices for ductless heat pump installation provided by Bonneville Power Administration, including strategies to supplement existing forced-air electric furnaces with ductless heat pumps in detached single-family and manufactured homes
- The illustrated glossary was removed and new definitions were added to the written glossary to clarify technical and program terms

If you have questions about the new specifications manual, contact the Existing Homes trade ally team at 1.866.365.3526.

Bigger Isn't Better: All About Manual J®

When homeowners start talking to contractors, sometimes they might hear a lot of industry jargon that can seem kind of confusing.

There is one piece of “jargon” that they should make sure you hear. If they are installing a replacement system, make sure they ask the contractor about Manual J®.

Manual J is an industry standard that describes a method for determining, basically, how “big” their air conditioning system should be for the size and type of house they live in. It's required by most building codes nationwide, because only Manual J offers the precise determination of system size needed to ensure that your system lasts longer, operates efficiently, and actually makes you comfortable.

If their contractor says that a Manual J isn't needed for your system replacement — even if that contractor is a member of ACCA — they should consider finding another contractor. Full system replacements always require Manual J as a fundamental step toward quality installation.

When so-called contractors say, “Oh, your home is X square feet, so you need a X-ton unit,” they should tread very carefully! This “rule of thumb” is always wildly inaccurate. It results in the installation of systems that are often too big for their actual needs.

When a system is too big, it results in discomfort — because the system can't remove moisture from the air properly. It results in systems that work too hard — and cost too much money — and die early deaths! That's a lot of money out of their pocket for a system that doesn't even make them feel comfortable.
